Identifying applicants with the potential to succeed on the most oversubscribed university course

Medical programmes are amongst the most selective and oversubscribed university courses globally, therefore it is arguably even more important to ensure the design of a university admissions process is robust.

In this presentation, we will discuss the different elements of selection processes for university medical programmes around the world, from multiple-mini-interviews (MMIs) to admissions tests. We will also discuss how admissions decisions can continue to be fair and transparent whilst also selecting applicants who have the highest potential, regardless of their background.
